"The wise words of the old man resonate with a timeless truth: participation is key to truly experiencing life. When he said, 'Be there or be square,' he was emphasizing the importance of being present and engaged in the moments that matter. It's a gentle reminder that life offers us countless opportunities to connect, learn, and grow, but these moments can easily slip away if we choose to remain on the sidelines. Embracing experiences, whether they are joyful or challenging, enriches our lives and fosters deeper relationships with those around us. So, let us take this advice to heart and strive to be active participants in our own stories, for it is in these moments that we find meaning and fulfillment."

Initially, I found myself dismissing the ominous predictions made by that Japanese cartoonist regarding the fate of Tokyo, viewing them as yet another cruel joke akin to the infamous California earthquake known as the Big One, which supposedly would cause the state to vanish beneath the Pacific Ocean.
Similarly, I recalled the eerie

Mayan prophecy that had captivated my attention for far too long, leading me to invest significant time and energy into a narrative that ultimately contributed to my own sense of stagnation regarding life and career aspirations.

The looming idea that the world would come to an end in 2012 had instilled a sense of futility in my efforts, making me question the purchasing a reserve seat with a window view, motivated by the words of an old carny preacher who warned me that there would be no festival seating in heaven.

He claimed that only a select few, around 144,000, would be granted entry, which made me feel an urgency to ensure my spot was reserved.
The idea of being part of such a momentous occasion filled me with both excitement and a sense of responsibility, as I pondered the implications of being among the chosen few in a celestial gathering.

For a decade now, I have carried the weight of disappointment and the shame of feeling like a naïve country bumpkin.
The memories of those misguided choices still haunt me, and I often find myself dreading the possibility of encountering one of those so-called husker Mayans. My frustration stems from the belief that they should be held accountable for the substantial amount of money I squandered on survival gear, all based on their dubious prophecies. The thought of confronting them stirs a mixture of anger and regret within me, as I

Tokyo on July 5, 2025, I found myself instinctively turning away from the sensationalism.
My initial reaction was to dismiss it as mere clickbait or perhaps a clever marketing strategy aimed at enticing travelers to book trips during the typically slow tourist season, a time when the sweltering heat and heavy rains deter most visitors who aren't traveling for business.

The idea that such a dire forecast could be leveraged to promote "cataclysm travel" felt disingenuous, as it seemed to exploit fear rather than offer genuine insight.

In a world already saturated with misinformation, I couldn't help but feel a sense of skepticism towards these narratives, questioning their authenticity and the motivations behind them.
